Generational Diversity

While in the past diversity has been primarily described in terms of ethnicity, race and gender, there is today a more profound difference impacting our business culture - generational diversity. It's more significant because it represents the differences in value systems. Our work in this area includes extensive primary research into the value systems, work ethics and work styles of each of the prevalent generations in the current workplace. Our process of supporting organizations is composed of two parts - the first is designed to create an awareness of these differences in order to facilitate communication and maintain a positive, productive work environment. The second is to provide a fundamental basis for strategically realigning organizations to support and utilize these differences for the benefit of the organization.
